The Aurora Borealis has always been a source of wonder to observers who live close to the Arctic circle and occasionally to those much closer to the equator. It is composed of dancing, lights that constantly change color and brilliance shimmering curtains rays, nebula-like swirls arcs, are some of the forms observed on the earth.

Strong auroras are accompanied by dramatic electric and magnetic effects on the earth. They are a promise of terrestrial power Geophysicists see the space immediately beyond the 10 earth's atmosphere as a huge electrical generator which develops power as the charged particles of solar wind pass through the earth's geomagnetic field. This power accelerates the solar wind toward the earth's surface. Where they collide with atoms in the upper atmosphere. Auroras are therefore visible manifestations of great quantities of power being "burned off"
